A 2010 article in Science confirms that most chronic disease results from environmental factors¹⁵; that is, most disease results from individuals missing what they need to thrive or being exposed to toxic factors such as pathogens or toxicants that induce harm. This is hopeful information, as the environment, unlike the genome, is modifiable.

Emerging Patterns of Disease. In Mad Travelers: Reflections on the Reality of Transient Mental Illnesses (1998), philosopher of science Ian Hacking develops a model to understand how new diseases arise at particular times and places. According to Hacking, certain illnesses "thrive" in what he terms particular "ecological niches."
