When you are applying to law school or a law firm, it is especially important that everything is spelled correctly and is concise. Don't be too generic in your greeting. If you are unsure who the hiring manager is, you can address your letter to the department head or use a title like "Senior Analyst Hiring Manager" instead of just using "To Whom it May Concern."

One of the burdens that young lawyers in particular face is trying to get a product (whether it be letter, pleading, brief to a barrister or a submission) that will be signed off by their supervisor. If there is any frustration in this process, it ordinarily doesn't arise from changes to the legal points or conclusions reached - it comes from changes to form, rather than substance .
